OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

From "The Nation," January 17, 1889.

We here have in successive chapters a lively account of the struggle that was held in Pennsylvania over the Constitution; of the well-nigh revolutionary wrangle in the Pennsylvania Assembly over the calling of a State Convention to act on the Constitution; of the state of public opinion in Pennsylvania before the Convention met; of the debate in the Convention; of the public temper while the Convention was sitting and after it rose; to which are added the anti-Federal letters of "Centinel," biographical sketches of the Pennsylvania members of the Federal Convention, similar sketches of the members of the Pennsylvania Convention, and an appendix containing James Wilson's Notes of the Debates on the Constitution in the Pennsylvania Convention, and the replies made at the time by Robert Morris and Thomas Mifflin to the hoarse diatribes with which they were assailed by "Centinel" and other pamphleteers. In no State did the fluctuations of political opinion for and against the Constitution rise higher than in Pennsylvania. . . . Time, which makes all things even, has certainly wrought its revenges on the rough polemics of 1787; but no time can state the dignity and worth of the high polemic which James Wilson brought to the defence of the Constitution in the day of its supreme trial. It is pleasant to find his work here placed in its proper historical setting, and to see the justice done to his associates which Elliott has failed to render in his inadequate compilations. And we are glad, too, to have the letters of "Centinel" in their integrity and sequence.
